The Two of Us poster (1967)

This first wave of modern design in America was imported by recent immigrants from Europe, seeking to escape the political climate of totalitarianism. These individuals brought Americans a firsthand introduction to the European avant-garde. Despite the European influence, American design had its own unique and identity distinct from continental approaches to modern design, known as the New York School.

Immigrants were placed on the vanguard of design and design became a vehicle of expression. The New York School's modernist identity of design and originality of concept was based on political and democratic thought, communication, and design sought communality for social communication (postmodern) and equality of voice for political expression. These phases of American graphic design (modern) introduced a consciousness to its original importance in the world, and continued until the 1970s.

Perhaps more than any other design, Paul Rand initiated this American approach to modern design. Of all designers of the mid-20th century, Paul Rand understood that design could be improved. He believed that design could be improved the design. The characteristics of the New York School were carried to the west coast by Paul Rand who extended the boundaries of graphic design by defining a new approach to the packaging and marketing of items.
