Multilingual corpora are those consisting of texts in more than one language, often a monolingual original and a translation. These translations vary greatly in their faithfulness, accuracy, style, and order of presentation, as well as in granularity of translation, that is, the size of the chunks being translated (e.g., word-to-word, sentence-to-sentence, paragraph-to-paragraph, or idea-to-idea). Since the reasons for constructing multilingual corpora include being able to correlate individual pieces of one text with corresponding parts of another, their use immediately raises the problem of text alignment, or computing which chunk of a text in one language corresponds to a given chunk of the parallel text in another language.

This is the major focus of Multilingual Corpora in Teaching and Research. Indeed, this book could more accurately have been titled Text Alignment in Multilingual Corpora: Overview and Case Studies. Text alignment, it quickly becomes clear, is the outstanding problem in research on multilingual corpora, and thus – to the extent that progress has been made in its solution – its outstanding success story. The problems that arise in alignment research reprise practically every issue in Natural Language Processing (NLP) and Automatic Translation, (e.g., sentence division, anaphor tracking, ambiguity resolution), and the peculiar limitations of the alignment task make the application of alignment strategies to these broader problems surprisingly productive, as is discussed in detail in this volume.

Multilingual Corpora consists of two introductory chapters, covering theoretical and methodological issues, the literature, and the state of the art (up to early 1998), as well as 10 individual case studies, each describing an existing corpus project, 2 in the US and the rest in Europe. All the case studies except the last (on problems aligning English and Chinese texts) deal strictly with Indo-European languages (Danish, English, French, German, Greek, Italian, Norwegian, Spanish, and Swedish) and most of the corpora discussed contain texts in just two languages.

Chapter 1, "Bilingual Text Alignment – An Overview," by Michael Oakes and Tony McEnery (one of the editors) of Lancaster University, is typical of recent work in CL/NLP in that it distinguishes sharply between statistical and linguistic methods of text alignment. As these authors put it (p. 4) "Statistical methods tend to work better for large corpora, since they are relatively rapid, while linguistic methods can be better for small corpora." The vast majority of the article is a survey of the statistical methods used in various alignment projects, including formulae and discussion of results, although three varieties of
