

Murder of a Metropolis

Smell, foul and pungent, greeted us on arrival at the airport. Stagnant rainwater, uncollected garbage and disgorging open manholes had turned the city into the world's largest sewerage network.

Outside the passenger terminal, we ran by chance into Mr. Hasan Jafri whose unfailing smile had obviously survived Karachi's atmospheric disaster. He offered us a ride which we gratefully accepted. "Oh, that," he exclaimed nonchalantly when I mentioned the pervasive smell, "one gets used to it. He mentioned other real problems: "People are getting electrocuted on the road; four died last week..." He cited Karachi's electrocution statistics for the previous five years, and we speculated on the possibility of suing its municipal government for multiple manslaughters.

He was right about the smell. By next day, I was used to it. But the 'problems', all man-made remained. Following a rain shower earlier in the afternoon the city's culvertless roads were flooded, knee-deep in some sections where water had collected from the previous week's rain. Cars stalled, hitting potholes, manholes and piles of rubbish. It took more than one hour by car to travel less than two miles from Zainab Market to the Marriott Hotel. Remarkably, people remained calm, generally helpful to each other; some managed even to smile back at us. A relative had an explanation for the pervasive stoicism. "Life, he said, "is normally difficult here. The rains have merely accentuated the difficulties."

This was an understatement. The same relative, a young architect, recounted how he has not been able to deliver a set of designs to a foreign group. "They were ready but we could not print them out. We have waited, five hours at a time, for the power line. It goes out sometimes before a sheet is printed. We have averaged six to eight hours a sheet." "But you told them about the power failures? I queried with, concern. "Why should they care," he snapped. "They are interested in the product they have contracted for, not my problems in producing it." His wife, a designer, says that in the last three weeks not more than three days worth of work has been done in her workshop. The printers who live in Landhi have missed work often because transportation is not available; also some of them live in kachcha homes which have collapsed; then there are the power failures. "We may be better off, she speculates, "if we do away with modern things like electricity, buses, telephones. We depend on them but our government does not know how to organise these things.

I reflect on their situation after they leave. They are talented, dynamic, and hard-working young professionals, just the kind a country relies on for fast growth. They came to Karachi from Lahore. Karachi is the magnet of educated and energetic Pakistanis. More than fifty per cent of the subscribers of English language dailies live there. But there, as in the rest of the country, they waste away. Their frustrations are palpable. Some leave the country and succeed elsewhere. Others become cynical, lose integrity, and join the unproductive race for fast bucks.

In the cafeteria of Marriott Hotel, an American business executive talked of his failed mission. He works for an international conglomerate and was here to explore investment opportunities in Pakistan. "Our chairman met some Pakistani high-ups. They convinced him that this was the place to invest in. So 'Aa came down." Well, how is it? "Some fast talkers they must be, he said of the Pakistan's official salesmen. "'Aa will sink dough into the Gulf of Mexico before 'Aa invest good money over here." Like most American businessmen, this gentleman was down-to-earth in his reasoning. Sardar Farooq Ahmed Khan Leghari would do well to hear him out before going off again on the hunt for another Asian Tiger.

"The elements are here; material (he represents a garment conglomerate), labour, enough skill for us to train people, and the wharf. We can bring in the machinery okay, and the designs, and train the supervisors. But this place is gonna be on vacation all the
