Abstract

This protocol outlines a systematic literature review to explore the evolution and contemporary applications of multifunctional landscapes (MFL) in rural planning. Initially focused on optimizing agricultural land use, the concept of MFL has expanded to integrate ecological, social, political, and economic objectives, reflecting a more holistic approach to landscape management. The review aims to trace this evolution and assess how contemporary MFL applications balance economic production, ecological sustainability, and human well-being. The methodology follows PRISMA guidelines and includes a systematic search across multiple academic databases to identify relevant studies. Data extraction will focus on key variables such as the definition and implementation of MFL, planning frameworks, challenges and opportunities in balancing diverse objectives, socio-technical transitions, and the spatial and temporal context of the studies. Additionally, the review will analyze patterns and synergies between existing policy methodologies used to assess MFL and the role of science and social equity in MFL outcomes.
