Love and Tensions James Madison University. School of Communication Studies, 2012. This study investigated the association of six different love styles e.g. Eros, Ludus, Storge, Pragma, Mania, and Agape with three different dialectical tensions e.g. autonomy, connection, predictability, novelty, and openness, closedness, and four different maintenance strategies e.g. selection, separation, neutralization, and reframing. One hundred and nineteen James Madison University students were recruited to take this online survey. The survey consisted of questions that identified the participant's love style, dominant tension, and most utilized maintenance strategy. Results showed an association between love styles and maintenance strategy employed. In addition, correlation showed that Storge was positively related to an individual's use of the separation strategy. No relationship existed between love styles and dialectical tensions. However, three correlations between specific pairings between a love style and a specific dialectical tension were found to be significant. Ludus and Mania were found to be positively related to the autonomy, connection tension. On the other hand, Eros was negatively related to the openness, closedness tension. Implications for the association between love styles and dialectical tensions are considered as are directions for future research.
