Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few strong highlights on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far right, so your subject is about two-thirds of the way from the window. Instead of 10 feet, an 8-foot window might work through an 8-foot wall.

For most window light shots, I "cheat light" my subject on the side of their face that's closest to the window by the use of the most shadows, and the side of their face away from the light. You do this by having them turn their heads away from the window toward me, and they look back at the camera without knowing their angle. This helps to make your subjects face look better and to guarantee that a flaring eye does not ruin a needed shot.

Also: Your subject might should be a little higher than your subject's head, so you're looking down. When you adjust your shooting, a little down at them, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattering look note that when your subject looks too wide, don't have your subject face the camera directly. Instead, have them turn in the window a bit (like you're shooting at their back) and up the corner in the shot.
