Window Light Portraits

Opposite page: Dark, natural light on the side of the lighthouse in the morning, with all windows open to let in as much light as the opposite side.

10. Light is not always your enemy when the window blinds are open. When you're in the process of shooting, the window is on the right, you can open your shades to reveal bright light from the opposite window or blinds, or any bright window directly across the room, and it's that simple.

11. For most window-light photos, "natural light" was taken at the side of that lighthouse, because that's the side of the lighthouse with the most windows, so the sun follows you as you move from side to side. If you're not shooting the opposite side, however, you can move to the side of the lighthouse, because the sun follows you as you move from side to side. If you're not shooting the opposite side, however, you can move to the side of the lighthouse, because the sun follows you as you move from side to side. If you're not shooting the opposite side, however, you can move to the side of the lighthouse, because the sun follows you as you move from side to side.

12. This scene might sound like a new chapter from your children's book, or even the beginning of a story about people shooting a film scene in their garage. But it's not. It's a scene from a real photograph. An iPhone photograph, but one that makes you believe that you could have been a part of the scene. The young, slightly nervous-looking girl on the left is the same little girl from above, as that first shot of the scene in the book.
