Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few shadows on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their shadow in the window. In this shot, the subject is on the far right. First, you place your subject so their back is less than two feet from the window. Instead of 10 feet, so any light coming through is going to hit her directly.

Set: For most window light shots, I "shoot light" on the subject on the side of their face that is closest to the window. In this case, that's the right shoulder, and the left shoulder is on the right side. You do this by having them turn their torso away from the window toward me, and they look back at the camera without knowing their angle. This helps to make sure subjects face back toward me to guarantee that a flaring eye-line like here is avoided.

Set: Your subject might should be a little higher than your subject's head, so you're looking over their shoulder when you're shooting. A little lower is fine, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattering look note that make your subject look less wide, don't have your subject face the camera directly. Instead, have them face to the side a bit like you're shooting at their back when you're closer to the shot.
