

Michael Angelo does not complain of it, nay, even praises Domenico both for his art and his manners. But this is a slight digression ; let us return to our story.

VI. Possibly not less wonderful was another labour of Michael Angelo's done at this time, perhaps as a jest. Some one lent him a drawing of a head to copy ; he returned his copy to the owner instead of the original and the deception was not noticed at first, but the boy talking and laughing about it with one of his companions it was found out. Many people compared the two and found no difference in them, for besides the perfection of the drawing, Michael Angelo had smoked the paper to make it appear of the same age as the original. This brought him a great reputation.*

VII. Now drawing one thing and now another, the boy had no fixed plan or method of study. It happened one day that Granacci took him to the gardens of the Medici of San Marco. In this garden the Magnificent Lorenzo, father of Pope Leo, a man renowned for every excellence, had disposed many antique statues and decorative sculptures. Michael Angelo, seeing these things and appreciating the beauty of them, never afterwards went to the workshop of Domenico, but spent every day at the gardens, as in a better school, always working at something or other. Amongst the rest, he studied one day the head of a Faun, in appearance very old, with a long with the above-named masters during this time, to learn the art of painting, and to practise the same, and to be at the order of the above-named ; and they for their part, shall give him in the course of these three years twenty-four florins (florini di Sagello, £8 12s.) ; to wit, six florins in the first year, eight in the second, ten in the third, making in all the sum of ninety-six pounds (lire)."

A note of April 16, 1488, records that two florins were paid to Michael Angelo upon that day. The total sum is estimated by Gotti (p. 6, note) to equal 206·40 lire present value—about £8 12s. It was usual for apprentices to pay a sum to their masters rather than to be paid.

* Drawings, even by old masters, were of no pecuniary value in those days ; they were merely kept for use in the workshop. The fashion of collecting drawings for their own sake was invented by Giorgio Vasari some sixty years later.
