Window Light Portraits

Opposite page: Dark, natural light on the side of the lighthouse in the morning, with all windows open to let in lots of light on the opposite side.

10. Light is not always your enemy when the window blinds are open. When you're in the process of taking a portrait, the window is on the right, just open your curtains to reveal bright light from the opposite window on the left, creating a soft, even, even light without any harsh shadows.

11. For most window-light photos, "natural light" was taken at the side of your face with a camera that's oriented to the sun with the lens diagonal, so the sun follows you as you move. But for me, by taking the opposite side, the sun follows me as I move, and I can take a photo with the lens parallel to the sun, so it's easier to focus and a much faster and a quicker way of shooting with the sun at your back.

12. This scene might sound like a new chapter from your childhood book, or even a nursery rhyme. After all, when people shooting a photo of their aging parents, it's natural to take a portrait. For a more dynamic look, take the same shot, but turn the camera back and about 45 degrees, so the person's face has strong shadow on one side and light on the other. It's like you're shooting a portrait of the sun.
