Abstract.

The aim of the paper is to provide an understanding of real-life negotiations made across various systems (residents, housing board, or municipality) to accommodate the newcomers' cultural needs, its influence on their use of space, and how this impacts the level of attachment to their surroundings. Once newcomers are granted residency in a new society, a challenge for them is adapting the surrounding space according to their cultural needs. For urban practitioners, a problem is including the diverse cultural needs when configuring the use of spaces. This paper examines how different actors partner to negotiate the use of space via a case study approach in Saupstad-Kolstad. This neighborhood is located in the south-western part of Trondheim and houses the highest percentage of immigrant residents in the city, representing the most culturally diverse area. In order to carry out the study, a social constructionist approach has been adopted since it is best used in scenarios where there are no single "realities" but many versions and perceptions of it. To acquire the multiple perspectives, the methods used by the researchers are secondary data review, observations, interviews and triangulation of information.

Introduction

The recent influx of refugees has brought new challenges for countries which seek to grant asylum for displaced families. Urban practitioners realize the challenges that urban systems face in integrating the sudden influx of newcomers. This paper provides an understanding of the role that culturally adequate spaces play in the process of social integration for newcomers, using the context of Saupstad-Kolstad, located in Trondheim, Norway.

Trondheim is the third largest city in Norway with a population of 184,060 (SSB, 2015). The annual growth of population is 2,221 people per year. According to the municipality, Trondheim will receive 1,100 refugees during 2016. Though not a large number in the overall scheme of displaced people in the world, for Trondheim this represents an additional growth of 50% from its forecast.

Norway's efforts regarding structural integration had helped newcomers become part of the existing systems, yet challenges still exist regarding social integration (Valente and Blumar, 2010). The purpose of this research is to contribute towards understanding social integration through the lens of spatial features.

Social integration can be understood as the creation of mutual relationships and expansion of social networks between the host community and newcomers (Heckman and Bisselwick, 2005). It can be seen as the interaction and cooperation amongst both actors at individual and community levels. For the purpose of this paper, host community is the Norwegian-born residents of Saupstad-Kolstad.

Newcomers are refugees and migrants who, despite the different reasons to change their place of residence, face similar challenges once in a new country. Newcomers may deal with challenges such as: marginalization, community disruption, increased morbidity and mortality while the host countries face costs, social and political polarization and resistance (Forum, 2016).

The study identified an area where most newcomers reside in Trondheim. According to Statistics Norway's Information Centre (SSB, 2015) Saupstad-Kolstad houses the highest percentage of migrants (29.4%), in comparison with the whole city of Trondheim (8.8%), representing the most culturally diverse area of Trondheim. Taking Saupstad-Kolstad as a case study, this paper explores the relationship between space and social integration to understand how newcomers manipulate space to suit their cultural needs, and what role does this play on their social integration process.

Marking the Land investigates how hunter gatherers use physical landscape markers and environmental management to impose meaning on the spaces they occupy The land is full of meaning for hunter gatherers Much of that meaning is inherent in natural phenomena but some of it comes from modifications to the landscape that hunter gatherers themselves make Such alterations may be intentional or unintentional temporary or permanent and they can carry multiple layers of meaning ranging from practical signs that provide guidance and information through to less direct indications of identity or abstract highly symbolic signs of sacred or ceremonial significance This volume investigates the conditions which determine the investment of time and effort in physical landscape marking by hunter gatherers and the factors which determine the extent to which these modifications are symbolically charged Considering hunter gatherer groups of varying sociocultural complexity and scale Marking the Land provides a systematic consideration of this neglected aspect of hunter gatherer
