Academic Library Book Review. Cristina Rossetti was nineteen years old when she wrote Maude Prose and Verse in 1850. Clearly autobiographical, the novel examines the heroine's endeavor to resist the notion that modesty, virtue, and domesticity constitute the sole duties of womanhood. For the precocious young poet, the work was only one of several projects of her teens. Growing up in London as the youngest child in a gifted and unusual family of artists and writers, Rossetti had early developed a poetic vocation. But by the time she wrote Maude, the lively, passionate, and adventurous little girl who had hated needlework, delighted in fiercely competitive games of chess, and explored the country with her brothers, became a painfully constrained, sickly, and over-scrupulous teenager. Maude makes clear that at least some of Rossetti's affliction came from anxieties about poetic achievement; her wishes both to be admired for her genius and to renounce it as unfeminine. Often overshadowed by her brother Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Christina struggled to express her own independent authorial voice and to resist a life bound by the constraints and demands of the traditional female role. Other late Victorian attitudes towards Anglican women's communities are brought out in On Sisterhoods by Dinah Mulock Craik, which appeared in Longman's magazine in 1883. Craik herself worked on the literary border between feminine gentility and feminist rebellion. In 1850, when Christina Rossetti was writing Maude within the confines of her family, Dinah Mulock was supporting herself and her two younger brothers by her pen. On Sisterhoods confronts head-on the woman question, asserting that women's role is to find beauty in their lives through altruism and good works to be more or less good women Craik provides a radical solution to the woman question by advocating the encouragement of Anglican sisterhoods effectively women's co-operatives For her the strongest argument for such a sisterhood is the alternative life it offers to single women with no outlets for their maternal emotions The third text presented here Craik's A Woman's Thoughts About Women was a widely circulated manual of advice on female self-sufficiency for unmarried women based on her own experience in a family left destitute by an eccentric father when she was nineteen It addressed a pressing contemporary problem the large number of urban single women who were well educated and qualified but for whom traditional employment offered no place Craik understood that independence would come hard to middle class women yet she was optimistic about the ways women might re-educate themselves abandoning false pride and learning to manage small businesses or conduct trades Throughout her career Craik masked her private feminist views with disdain for women's rights and criticism of women's public activism Unmarried and self-supporting until the age of forty she wrote about the problems of single and working women in over fifty popular novels children's stories and collections of essays
