Window Light Portraits

Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few strong highlights on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far left of the frame, and your subject is about two-thirds of the way from the window. Instead of 10 feet, an 8-foot window might work through an 8-foot wall.

For most window light shots, I "cheat light" my subject by the side of their face and a shadow falls across the face with the most shadows, and the side of their face gets the most light. You do this by having them turn their heads towards the camera and away from the window. And they look back at the camera without knowing their angle. This helps to make your subjects face look better and to guarantee that a flaring eye does not ruin a window shot.

Also: Your subject might should be a little higher than your subject's head, so you're looking down. When you adjust your shooting, a little down at them, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattering look note that make your subject look less wide, don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have their face to the side a bit (like you're shooting at their back) take up the corner in the shot.
