The iterative algorithm involves a program that iterates the entire code to be tested, then takes the application as a function call to the  $\mu$  (100 or 500). This is related to dynamically computing the application output when a value is added to the circuit just before the  $\mu$  is being input. The entire code is executed sequentially until the value is added and a message will be displayed indicating the completion of taking input. The iterative algorithm takes approximately 10 seconds to compute the value of a 500-bit based machine that which the user will give manually (just typing the value number directly) that will be represented onto the application interface in Realtime.
