RAIGŌ TAKAMORI.

Raigō Takamori was a samurai of the Satsuma domain, whose common name was Kichimochi, and whose literary name Nasahi. He was brave and silent, prompt in decision, and dauntless in danger; his form was dignified, his eyes were sharp and glittering; he was extremely chivalrous from his youth, and when grown a man, was loved and obeyed by young folk. Just then the last Tokugawa Shōgunate began to decline; men faithful to the real Emperor in Kyōto arose everywhere, speaking against the ascendancy of the Shōgunate. Raigō also came to Kyōto (Imperial city) secretly, and took part in that "loyalty business" (Amei) with other eminent loyalists (Kinsaike). He was especially intimate with the priest Genshō of the Kiyomizu temple, who was greatly favored by the Emperor's highest minister Prince Konon, and thus was able to have communications with the Court. Seeing this movement of the loyalists, the Shōgunate was somewhat troubled, and ordered Maeda a member of the Council of State at Yedo, and Sakai the governor of the Imperial city (Kyōto), to arrest all the suspicious men, belonging to the Court nobles, and those nobles who were loyalists.

Raigō and Genshō, seeing that they had also been put under the ban, escaped to Akasaka no Saki, and hid themselves in the house of Shinichi, one of the loyalists. After some time Raigō went alone to Satsuma, leaving the priest there, in order to prepare a hiding-place for him. But before his return, Genshō started from there, and, going to Chikuzen, concealed himself in the house of Hirano Jirō, who was also a loyalist. But as the Shōgunate searched for him with rigor, Hirano took him to Satsuma; but the boundary guards of Satsuma did not allow them to enter the province, because they feared the Shōgun. Now Raigō, finding no hiding-place for the priest and for himself, decided with him to die in the sea. They took a vessel under the pretext of going to Higo by sea, aboard of which Hirano also was. They embarked; but as Raigō and Genshō were talking and humming poems in the prow of the vessel, Hirano kept himself quiet in the interior of it, when suddenly a splashing sound of water was heard, which induced him to come towards the bow. He came, but alas! they were not there! They had already sunk to the bottom of the sea! He was dumbfounded for a while. But after some time, their corpses rose to the surface of the water floating. They were instantly drawn up. Genshō was dead, but Raigō came to life again.

Then Raigō changed his name into Kikuchi Gengo, and hid himself in some place; but, soon being detected, was transported to the island of Ōshima off the coast of Satsuma by his lord. This was the third time that he was banished to that island, always for the same crime—crime which was soon changed into honor. Raigō now changed his
