spiritual and nowadays supposedly more scientific ones based on natural science and the humanities alike are offered Social science offers cultural values models and the dynamics of group affiliation throughout socialization to answer the question on the assumption that man's self perception is a cultural construct Here man's identity is a matter of sociocultural conditioning in addition to unique individual and universal endowments which nonetheless are additional conditioners So the term conditioning prevails Science concludes to science specific determinisms which are also conditioned perception and philosophical and spiritual answers as to man's identity bear the conditioning hue of the ideology that acts as a filter of perception Is there only relativity in the identity construction of man or is there anything that transcends ism relative identity construction that explains man's real identity and that can therefore appease man himself and his relations with other identity assumptions that tend to clash in the social arena as they entail identity specific values and behavioural patterns This is a seemingly impossible question because man's mind that tries to answer the question seems to be a time relative construct itself which can therefore similarly offer only relative answers that are not time enduring because that mind changes with its conditioning in time and therefore tends to provide relative answers So how can the quest for human identity be managed in a satisfactory way a way that is not conducive to identity clashes based on identity mismanagement
