New East Asian Economic Development Keun Lee, 1993 In this economic tour de force a talented young Korean scholar trained in the United States and tested in various international fora highlights the dynamism being displayed in East Asia in some of the world's most fascinating economies In this set of interrelated essays Dr Keun Lee of Seoul National University evaluates the development experiences not only of some of the world's fastest growing economies like South Korea Taiwan and more recently China but also contrasts their performances with the more lethargic or hesitant pace in North Korea and the former Soviet Union His theme is that these East Asian economies have a common feature in the active if not dominant role of the state in setting and implementing economic direction Yet the more dynamic entities have also relied heavily on market interaction as their engine of growth What policy lessons can the slower growing economies learn from their more dynamic neighbors and what are some implications for the global economy from this continuing interaction Dr Lee makes no prediction as to the emergence of a particular doctrine What he sees is that state activism will continue to drive growth in this strategic world region

Asian Studies Gerard Jenner, The bustling financial district of Singapore rises from tropical waters like a modern Atlantis its gleaming towers reflecting both the setting sun and the ambitious dreams of a small island nation that transformed itself from colonial trading post to global financial hub within a single generation Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew

s vision of leveraging Singapore s strategic location and multicultural population to become a bridge between East and West has created a city state that exemplifies Asia s remarkable economic transformation while challenging Western assumptions about the relationship between political systems cultural values and economic development The economic miracle that swept across East and Southeast Asia from the 1960s through the 1990s fundamentally altered global power relationships while demonstrating alternative pathways to modernization that did not require wholesale adoption of Western political institutions or cultural values Countries like South Korea Taiwan and Singapore achieved unprecedented rates of economic growth through export oriented industrialization strategies that combined strong state intervention with market mechanisms creating development models that challenged prevailing economic orthodoxies while proving that Confucian cultural values could support rather than hinder capitalist economic development Japan s post war recovery established the template for Asian economic success through a combination of technological innovation export promotion and strategic industrial policy that enabled a devastated nation to become the world s second largest economy within three decades The Japanese model of developmental capitalism characterized by close cooperation between government bureaucrats and business leaders lifetime employment systems and emphasis on continuous improvement provided inspiration for other Asian countries while demonstrating how traditional cultural values could be adapted to support modern economic growth
