Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few shadows on the opposite side.

It's Done: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far left, so your subject is about two-thirds of the way from the window. Instead of 10 feet, an eye level, enough window light comes in to light their face evenly.

Tip: For most window light shots, I "cheat light" my subject on the side of their face that's closest to the window by the use of the most shadows, and the side of their face away from the main light. You do this by having them turn their heads slightly away from the window toward the other side of the camera without knowing their angle. This helps to make your subjects face look better and to guarantee that a flaring eye from the hair is a wanted flaw.

It's Done: Your subject might should be a little higher than your subject's head, so you're looking down. When you adjust your shooting, a little down on them, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattering look note that when your subject looks too white, don't have your subject face the camera directly. Instead, have them look to the side a bit (like you're doing) so their face takes up less space in the shot.
