

Figure 1. The path to systemic oral bioavailability for peptides. The oral dosage form dissolves in the stomach or small intestine depending on whether it is enteric coated. The peptide is liberated and must survive stomach acid if released there, as well as pepsin. If it releases in the upper small intestine, it must survive exposure to pancreatic enzymes. Its permeability across the intestinal epithelium is likely to be of low capacity due to its large molecular weight and hydrophilicity. During the restricted journey across the epithelium it risks exposure to cytochrome P450 and cytosolic peptidases. If it permeates, it must then travel via the hepatic portal vein to the liver where it may undergo the liver first pass effect. If it arrives in the systemic circulation, the intact fraction that has made it from the original liberation from the dosage form is termed bioavailability and this value is expressed relative to an injectable administration route for the same peptide.
