Morphological and Cellular Aspects of Tail and Limb Regeneration in Lizards Lorenzo Alibardi,2009-11-26 The present review covers a very neglected field in regeneration studies namely tissue and organ regeneration in reptiles especially represented by the lizard model of regeneration The term regeneration is intended here as the ability of an adult organism to recover damaged or completely lost body parts or organs The process of recovery is further termed restitutive regeneration when the lost part is reformed and capable of performing the complete or partial physiological activity performed by the original lost body part Lizards represent the only amniotes that at the same time show successful organ regeneration in the tail and organ failure in the limb Marcucci 1930a b Simpson 1961 1970 1983 This condition offers a unique opportunity to study at the same time mechanisms that in different regions of the same animal control the success or failure of regeneration The lizard model is usually neglected in the literature despite the fact that the lizard is an amniote with a basic histological structure similar to that of mammals and it is therefore a better model than the salamander an a mniote model to investigate regeneration issues
