Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of the face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a nice bright color on the opposite side.

Tip: If you happen upon a subject that fits window lighting, you want their shoulder to the window on the side the window is on the far left. From the other side, the subject is more back a few feet from the window. Instead of 10 feet, you may want to try eight feet or even six feet, depending on the subject.

For more window light ideas: “Window light” is a subject on the side of the face and a great portrait technique. To do this with the most dramatic, and the softest, look for the subject to be on the side of the face closest to the window. The subject should be looking away from the window, and the light should be coming from the side of the face. The subject should be looking away from the window, and the light should be coming from the side of the face. The subject should be looking away from the window, and the light should be coming from the side of the face.

For more window light ideas: A nice subject that fits window light is a portrait of a woman. When you are shooting a woman, you want her to be looking away from the window. The subject should be looking away from the window, and the light should be coming from the side of the face. The subject should be looking away from the window, and the light should be coming from the side of the face.
