

you wedge yourself into a corner next by a window, drag your crumpled coat across your knee, and rest your hat on top of it, and your fingers clasp on a small clump of frayed cotton, the capped remnants of broken stitches that long since attached a window button to your coat.<sup>7</sup> You have no leverage, you have no place to push you start into the slip in your seat, your breast pressed against the backrest in front of you, your feet jammed into the discomfort that compresses your widened posture, and your breathing eventually becomes regular again. Settling your head against the cold windowpane, you rest your palm against the dense sheet of condensation that has settled there, leaving a cloudy frame around the now transparent patch of glass. Outside, beyond the parallel tracks, between a small clump of trees and a single row of houses, you see a large blue van take a sharp right turn onto a winding road, and you watch its angular silhouette fade into the distance until it becomes nothing more than a colour drained birth, replaced by the vast landscape that spreads out unevenly ahead of it, and your thoughts clasp on the circumstances that forced you to undertake this journey, a journey you had no intention to make underrate this journey, a journey you had no intention to make

now and again you catch the tail of an image (the curve of a roof, an empty street, a tree, a van, a house) leaping that yet is not yet of your consciousness, shifting and lurching at perimeters of memory, blurring and reblurring your thoughts lifting your damp palm from the window, you begin to trace a series of erratic lines through the cloudy film with your finger, describing the sparse surface with transient marks that compress under your breath, and your skin claws through the residual liquid that trickles from the underside of your wrist (later you will notice a small yellow stain at the base of your wrist, but you will no longer recall how it got there). Beyond the shadow the landscape dissolves into a thick white fog and a fine drizzle veils the dark-coloured shapes that wheel past the transparent patch of glass, which is almost completely off centre if you examine the frame of the window.

now, you feel a series of sharp jolts as the train lurches to a halt, and you watch an almost empty coffee cup halt from the shadowy niche under the seat adjacent to the one in front of you. The cup submerges in its startleing flight, spluttering across the narrow passway in fits and starts, drops of liquid still dripping from its pooling mouth. A low rumbling sound rises from beneath your feet as the train begins to move again, and the cup shatters briefly on the trembling floor before coming to a standstill at the foot of a chair, on the opposite side of the aisle, beside a pair of black fabric shoes, the wall polished top of which glint fitfully in the shadow cast by the funnel of light passing through the dark corner window above the cup a flaccid head swings from side to side, the silhouette shadow that hovers the flapper head a yellowish tone to the otherwise pallid flesh, the substance how is amplified against the dark grey crayon that cuts a sharp line across the base of the wrist. The stark contrast enfolds your gaze magnifying the intricate network of fine veins protruding beneath the skin clinking the boneless fingers, the tips of which are bleached by the translucent light that swirls neatly around them. The index finger is bound with a pink bandage and you notice that the loose adhesive edge is coated with particles that, the flaccid head swings from side to side like a pendulum, beneath it the almost empty coffee cup quivers on the trembling floor, released by the insistent rhythm of

into a tunnel, joined in by the curved walls of the underpass, its detoured gaze is swallowed by the glutinous darkness that surrounds it. The window blanches as you turn toward it and you watch the unfamiliar face shimmering on the blacksmith screen in front of you, beyond is the compartment and its occupants rock back and forth hovering in a strange projected space that reaches into your narrow thoughts, perceiving them with intention. You struggle to recall how you got here but a stubborn memory strains through you, informing your judgment with a contagious uncertainty that progresses through stages within you, gnawing away at the adhesive connections that bind your sense of personality together until any semblance of coherence dissolves you. Again and again you retraces your steps, replaying them over and over, you strive to establish a motive, to reconstruct the parts of the plot, but the more desperately you scrutinize the sequence of events the less certain you are of what happened, possible paths multiply as undefined mental maps and timelines, the salient details modified by the typical rhythm of
