Mechanisms Of Hypertension:

Cellular and Molecular Mechanisms in Hypertension Robert H. Cox, 2013-03-08 Hypertension is recognized to be one of the major risk factors for the development of peripheral vascular disease The last decade has witnessed several major advances in therapy for hypertension including the development of angiotensin converting enzyme inhibitors and calcium channel blockers These compounds have greatly improved the ability to control blood pressure and to reduce the impact of this risk factor on morbidity and mortality In spite of these advances cardiovascular disease remains a major health problem in most modern industrialized countries with related deaths exceeding those from all other causes combined In contrast to these advances in therapy our understanding of the basic mechanisms responsible for the pathogenesis of hypertension remains incomplete Recent studies have produced new insights into the nature of the regulation of muscle contraction in both heart and blood vessels as well as the changes in muscle function that occur in hypertension However the effects of antihypertensive therapy both in terms of restoring normal function and in producing reversal of hypertension associated changes has not been as thoroughly studied especially in the vasculature Studies in the heart suggest that the efficacy of different therapeutic agents in restoring normal function and reversing hypertensive changes vary substantially with the mechanism of action of the therapeutic agent It has also been recently determined that some therapeutic agents produce adverse effects on plasma lipid profiles which could lead to the secondary acceleration of the atherosclerotic process while at the same time normalizing blood pressure      Mechanisms of Hypertension Council for High Blood Pressure

Research, François M. Abboud, 1970      Mechanisms of Hypertension, 1970      Immune Mechanisms of Hypertension Michael J. Ryan, 2013-09-01 In the vast majority of patients hypertension has no identifiable cause Moreover despite decades of discovery and therapeutic development approximately only half of the hypertensive patients are achieving clinically recommended blood pressure control For these reasons there has been continued interest in studying the factors that underlie the pathogenesis of hypertension One area of research that has garnered significant attention is the potential link between immune system activation and blood pressure Several lines of evidence dating back several decades support the concept for this association This monograph gives a history of the early studies linking immune system function with hypertension and an overview of the large number of studies published in the past decade The major focus is on the components of the innate and adaptive immune systems for which there is considerable evidence of their contributions to blood pressure control      Endocrine Mechanisms in Hypertension John H. Pathophysiological Mechanisms of Hypertension and Its Complications Josef Zicha, Ivana Vaněčková, 2023-01-31 Essential hypertension is still an important health care problem It is necessary to investigate its mechanisms in animal models The potential clinical importance of such experimental research might be expected This Special Issue concerned several important topics First several studies focused on the pathophysiological mechanisms responsible for blood pressure elevation during hypertension development organ damage in chronic hypertension and drugs targeting hypertension and or its complications Other studies were interested in the participation of central and peripheral blood pressure control changes in vascular structure and function and neural humoral and endocrine factors Furthermore the contribution of altered redox signaling chronic inflammation microbiome changes and interactions of genetic and environmental factors were evaluated in multiple papers Finally special attention was paid to the progress in pharmacological tools for the control of hypertension and associated organ damage genetic modifications to alter blood pressure levels and non pharmacological interventions attenuating hypertension or its complications The original articles or reviews covered the interesting aspects of the pathophysiology of hypertension and associated end organ damage the use of various experimental hypertensive models and the importance of specific environmental factors acting in distinct phases of the ontogeny We especially appreciate the presentation of new ideas and the critical discussion of traditional theories
