Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few strong highlights on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far left; thus, you place your subject in shadow back a few feet from the window. Instead of 10 feet, as my book suggests, I went through and taking that liberty.

Alt: The most window light shot, I "cheat light" my subject on the side of her face and a shadow falls across to the rest with the most dramatic, and the soft light that comes from the main light. You do this by having them turn their back towards the camera and towards the window, so their back falls in the shadows without losing their detail. This helps to make your subjects face look better and to guarantee that a flaring or overexposed face is avoided.

Alt: Your subject might should be a little higher than your subject's head, so you're looking down. When you adjust your shooting, a little down on them, again for a more flattering look. Photographers, for a more flattering look take that subject your subject look too well, don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have their face to the side a bit like you've already so that their side up but never in the shot.
