Window Light Portraits

Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few highlights on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far right, so your subject is about two-thirds of the way from the window. Instead of 10 feet, an eye-level window is only 4 feet away, so taking that distance.

For most window light shots, I "cheat light" my subject on the side of their face that's closest to the window by the use of the most shadows, and the side of their face that's furthest from the window. You do this by having them turn their head towards the window and away from the window, so their face is in the window without being too bright. This helps to make your subject's face look better and to guarantee that a flaring or overexposed face is avoided.

Tip: Your subject's head should be a little higher than your subject's body, so you're capturing your iPhone at an angle, so you're shooting a little above their head, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattering look take that subject's head back a little, don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have their face to the side a bit (like you're shooting at their back) and up a bit more in the shot.
