Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few wisps of hair blowing into the camera lens.

It's Done: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid those harsh shadows in the window. In this shot, the window is to the far left. First, you place your subject so there's just a few feet from the window. Instead of 10 feet, so any light coming through is enough to bring that shadow.

Tip: For most window light shots, I "cheat light" my subject on the side of their face that's closest to the window so they're not with the most shadows, and the side of their face away from the main light. You do this by having them turn their heads exactly the same amount as you move around, so their look feels a little better without knowing their angle. This helps to make sure subjects face their camera and to guarantee that a flattery, so they're more a rounded face.

It's Done: Your subject's head should be a little higher than your subject's nose, so you're looking down. When you adjust your shooting, a little down on them, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattering look take that subject your subject look too wide, don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have them turn in the window a bit (like you're doing) so their face takes up less space in the shot.
