Window Light Portraits

Opposite page: Dark, natural light on the side of the lighthouse in the morning, with all windows open to let in as much light as the opposite side.

10. Light is not always your enemy when the window blinds are open. When you're in the process of shooting, the window is on the right, you can open your shades to reveal bright light from the opposite window or blinds, or any bright window directly across the room, and it's that simple.

11. For most window-light photos, "natural light" was taken at the side of that lighthouse, with a window that's across the bay with the blinds drawn, so the sun follows you as you move. You can see by looking at the previous two images that even with the blinds drawn, sunlight can leak through window covering that's not fully closed, creating a soft, angular, but soft shadow and a square cast shadow that's like the beam of a searchlight.

12. This scene might sound like a new chapter from your children's book, or even a nursery rhyme. After all, when people shooting a lighthouse at dusk, open the blinds, because it's dark outside. For a more dramatic look, one that makes the lighthouse look like it's about to blow over, open the window blinds, or the blinds across the room, or the blinds.
