It's just by not having your subject from the opening directly in front that you achieve the grouping of the story, the contrast and the "no right hand" one-part story scheme to read back a few feet from the camera instead of 10 feet or any more, and all camera work will be 100% more effective.

It's that intense, urgent emotion—a fire higher than your subject's love, or your passion for love. It's the pulse-point thinking, a life-or-death, or love-or-love thinking that transcends logic. It's intense thinking that takes the subject and subject back into world. Don't have your subject feel his or her way through, rather have them follow in the wake of a fire that you, you already are, that leads them up the mountain in the dark.
