Study 5 involved observing how individuals responded under conditions considered to be high risk when they did not know they were being assessed. Individuals were observed in the presence of magazines which contained pictures of children considered to be high risk and other magazines which did not. Results showed that all of the individuals looked at the high risk magazines on almost every available opportunity. Study 6 involved applying a standard behavioral preference assessment procedure to assess age and gender preferences. Results showed that specific preferences for age and gender were obtained and the outcomes generally matched the preferences identified through the arousal assessments.

Sex Offender Placement Elaine M. Howle, 2009-02. Concerns California's process for placing sex offenders (SO) in residential facilities. It concludes that state laws, regulations, and departmental policies do not require licensing departments to consider the criminal background of potential clients, including registered SO, that the licensed facilities plan to serve. State law does not allow SO on parole to reside with other SO in a single family dwelling that is not a residential facility. However, the report found several instances of 2 or more SO on parole illegally residing in the same hotel room. Moreover, local law enforcement agencies have not performed formal assessments of the impact SO have on their resources and communities, and state laws generally do not require this.
