

son, who wrote a treatise on The Science of Being a Painter. Later, when the cult of the picturesque was at its height, we find the critics of the time, however, the Rev. William Collier, quarrelling with Chantrey Hill, because it is not so good a landscape as might have been expected. — "we have however a complete formed distance." The habit of looking for pictures in the field, map, and of selecting and composing the view according to rules, is quite soon added to the topographical habit, and becomes strong enough to impress to the poets, as well as to the amateurs of painting.

What the rules were, and how they came to be, is the matter of the next chapter.

THE CULT OF THE PICTURESQUE

DRYDEN published his translation of De Froucy's De Arte Graphica in 1693. William Mason's appeared in 1718, when the cult of the picturesque was at its height. "I mean [by picturesque] nothing more than such ideas as could be transformed into a picture," writes William Collier, "and I distinguish widely between them and poetical beauty." Dryden compiled a guide book for collectors, "to give reasons to those who blindly value it." In the preface he says, "That Pictures and that Poem which comes nearest to the resemblance of Nature is the best. But it follows not that what pleases most in either kind is therefore good; but what might be pleasant Pictures were invented, that by them we might shew what Nature was, imitated, and how nearly." But Nature, means Nature seen through the eyes and the time-pallidened memory of old masters. "Connoisseurs should conform to the manner of the old masters, just as Epic should follow Homer, and Tragedy Sophocles." By the end of the seventeenth century the stage was already set.

The eighteenth century was the age of antiquarian research, and widely diffused classical scholarship. Even more, there has been a nostalgic longing among the English for the ancient splendours of Rome, and the romantic associations of the Campagna, its aqueducts and hills and quiet tombs and ruins. The Rev. Archibald Alison gives voice to the feeling (1790) in writing of "the emotion of sublime delight, which every man of common mind feels upon the first prospect of Rome . . . all that the labours of his people or the studies of his master age have acquired with regard to the history of that great people, open at once before his imagination, and present him with a field of high and sublimè imagery, which can never be exhausted." Visiting a such places with De Froucy in their hands, tourists would while gazing the millions hours of novel by fixing pictures to the scenes they passed, noting the "pleasing horrors" of the Alps, and remonstrating the "bold invention of Salvator Rosa, the 'effects of light' and 'delicate tints' of Claude's landscapes, and "the solid judgment" and "true resemblance to Nature" of Poussin.
