Window Light Portraits

Opposite page: Dark, natural light on the side of the building creates a dramatic look, with highlights and a few sun rays on the opposite side.

At right: By not having your subject face the window directly, you can then position the camera to the right. The window is on the right, but you can still choose to move back a few feet from the window instead of directly in front, so your subject won't be caught with direct sunlight.

At the bottom you see a light subject ("Window light") was taken at the side of their face with a camera that is angled to the side with the flash off-camera, so the sun behind them goes over their shoulder and the lighting from the side creates a soft, even, and balanced shadow. Position your hands and the camera behind your subject to allow for a soft, even, and balanced light from the side and a square crop featuring your subject from the shoulder back.

At the bottom right: You should be a few steps from your subject here, so you're capturing less light from other people standing a few feet in front, again to create balanced light throughout. As you follow the sun, the sun will follow back and forth as the sun sets (this is just about as the last rays of the sun are visible).
