

If a Primus stove is used for heating the soldering iron it should be provided with a wire bracket (A); and it is advisable if a coal or coke fire is used, to use a fire brick to keep the iron clean. (B) This is the way to fix a clipper to a pipe and this (C) to join two sheets of metal.

form containing the necessary flux. The latter is required to make the molten solder flow evenly over the surfaces which are to be joined.

First of all, those surfaces must be cleaned by scraping, or with a file or with emery cloth. Then, if ordinary solder is being used, a little flux should be applied to the surface. This may be either a liquid or a paste, and various proprietary brands can be bought quite cheaply.

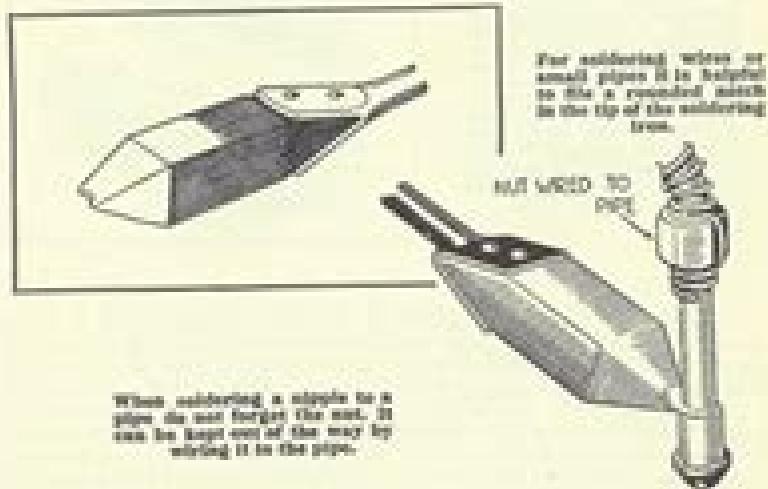

Meanwhile the soldering iron should be warming up. Despite its name, this is not an iron but a piece of copper with a point at one end and a handle at the other. In that simple form it must be heated in a gas flame or by a blow lamp, and it must not be allowed to get anything like red-hot. For an amateur who uses a soldering iron only occasionally, there is a great deal to be said for the self-contained electrically heated type, which can be connected to a lamp socket by a flexible lead. It is not very expensive, regulates its own temperature with fair accuracy, and can be brought into use with no preliminary heating.

When hot, its end must be cleaned by applying a little flux. If the point is not then covered with a film of bright silvery solder, it must be "tinned," i.e., rubbed gently with the solder until this film is present. Then each of the metal surfaces to be joined should be tinned by rubbing them with the hot end of the iron. For a small area there may be enough surplus solder on the iron for that purpose; if there is not, the solder stick should be held against the end of the iron until some of it has melted onto the surface. This should then be smeared over with the iron.

Provided these tinned surfaces are still clean, as they should be, the two can be placed together in the desired position. If one of them is thin, the job can then be completed simply by holding the hot iron against the back of that piece so that the two layers of solder at the joint melt and flow together. The work must be allowed to cool down before any strain is put upon it, because at one stage of the cooling the solder is apt to be very brittle and weak. If the joint does not form, apply a little flux, and try again.

The example described is, perhaps, the simplest of all soldering jobs, but it covers most of such work as is likely to be undertaken by readers of this booklet. If two thick parts have to be joined, it is more difficult to get the necessary heat to the tinned surfaces when they are in position. Sometimes this can be done simply by melting more solder with the iron along the edges of the joint. In other cases it may be necessary to apply the flame of a blow-lamp or a gas jet.

When soldering a clipper to a pipe do not forget the end. It can be kept out of the way by wiring it to the pipe.

It should be noted, too, that certain metals cannot be joined with ordinary solder. Aluminium and cast iron are examples, and some alloy steels also offer difficulty. A galvanized surface is another example.

Finally, care should be taken to clear away all traces of flux from the finished job. Although some of these are harmless, others have a corrosive action which, although mild, will eventually eat away the metal.
