Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few highlights on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far left; thus, you place your subject in shadow back a few feet from the window. Instead of 10 feet, as my book suggests, I went through and taking that liberty.

For most window light shots, I "cheat light" my subject on the side of their face that's closest to the window by the use of the most shadows, and the side of their face away from the main light. You do this by having them turn their heads towards the side away from the window, so their face looks a little shadowed without losing their detail. This helps to make your subjects face look better and to guarantee that a flaring or blown highlight is avoided.

Also: Your subject might should be a little higher than your subject's head, so you're looking down. When you adjust your shooting, a little down on them, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattering look note that make your subject look less wide, don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have their face to the side a bit (like you're shooting at their back) take up the corner in the shot.
