Developing Identities Massimiliano Spotti, 2008-08 At present western European societies are at the same time facing the aftermath of massive immigration movements and the challenges of new globalization waves Education is at the heart of this twofold experience On the one hand it is confronted with the demand of developing a canon for national identity construction On the other hand it is held responsible for the pupils emancipation in a globalizing society As a consequence teachers and pupils are challenged to deal with identity issues in their everyday classroom realities In politics the media and the educational field much has been said and done regarding immigrant minority pupils identities and their socio cultural and linguistic integration Still little is known about how identities are actually constructed and developed in the discourses of those who make up the primary school classroom This book reports on two ethnographic case studies carried out in multicultural classrooms in a Dutch and Flemish primary school It portrays the discourses and the interactions class teachers and their twelve year old pupils are engaged in on a daily basis In depth analyses are presented of the institutional discourses which the classrooms are part of and of the teachers and pupils discourses and their mutual relationships In both classrooms the analysis shows that pupils identities are constructed by the institutions and their teachers on the basis of their language behaviour and their presupposed belonging to a homogeneous cultural and or religious group The analysis at the same time makes clear that teachers have started questioning their understanding of immigrant minority pupils identities It further shows that the pupils under investigation are by no means passive objects of identity ascription Rather they appear as active and capable multilingual and multicultural stockbrokers ready and willing to invest in the linguistic and cultural currency that ensures the highest return on investment
