Out of Control Anne Campbell,1993 Psychologist and criminologist Anne Campbell listens to the voices of men and women as they describe their aggressive feelings and constructs an approach to the vexed topic of gender and aggression She argues that the crucial difference between female and male aggressiveness is that men see aggression as a means of gaining control over others while women see it as a loss of self control Daughters are deeply ashamed when they get angry but sons soon learn to associate aggression with courage and triumph The implications of this from rage within intimate relationships to violence in the streets and the attitude of the male establishment including the judiciary to women s anger and aggression are explored
