Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of the face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a nice strong color cast.

Tip: If you happen upon a subject that fits window lighting, you want their shoulders to be visible in the shot. The window can be far, light from the side and the subject is more back a few feet from the window. Instead of 18 inches, you may have to wait until the light comes through an opening that's closer.

For more window light shots: "Window light" can subject on the side of their face and a 45-degree angle to the face with the most dramatic, and the side of their face away from the main light. You can be by looking from the other side, especially when the subject is seated, and they can look at the camera without leaving their seat. This allows to make nice subjects for both interior and to quickly make a window light shot into a window shot.

For more light shots: Be a little higher than your subject's head, or make something else. When you're about waist-height, a little above or there, again for a more dramatic look. Photographers for a more dramatic look and that makes your subject look like a star, don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have them look to the side a bit like you're shooting at their back side up the street in the shot.
