Window Light Portraits

Opposite page: Dark, natural light on the side of the lighthouse in the morning, with all windows open to let in as much light as the opposite side.

10. Light is not always your enemy when the window blinds are open. When you're in the process of shooting, the window is on the right, you can open your shades to reveal bright light from the opposite window or blinds, or any bright window directly across the room. Just adjust.

11. For most window-light photos, "natural light" was taken at the side of your face with a camera that's oriented to the sun with the blinds drawn, so the sun follows you as you move. But for me, by shooting the opposite side, I can move the sun away from me and still have a bright, golden-yellow sunlight hitting the side of my face to create a warm, approachable look. I also square crop, framing the window from the top and left.

12. This scene might sound like a new chapter from your childhood book, or even a nursery rhyme. After all, when people shooting a film open a window, open the curtains, because it's brighter. But in most film scenes that require the window light to be bright, don't have your window face the sunny, brightly sunlit side from behind the camera (the other person always, in that last shot of the scene, is the dark).
