Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few strong highlights on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far left of the frame, and your subject is about two-thirds of the way from the window. Instead of 10 feet, an 8-foot window might work through an 8-foot wall.

Set: The most window light shot, I "cheat light" my subject on the side of their face and a shadow falls across the face with the most shadows, and the side of their face away from the main light. You do this by having them turn their head towards the camera and away from the window, so their face is in the shadows without losing their detail. This helps to make your subject's face look better and to guarantee that a flaring window light has a rounded face.

Set: Your subject might should be a little higher than your subject's head, so you're looking down. When you adjust your shooting, a little down on them, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattering look take that subject your subject look too wide, don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have them face to the side a bit like you've already so that their side up but more in the shot.
