Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few strong highlights on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far left; thus, you place your subject in shadow back a few feet from the window. Instead of 10 feet, as my book suggests, I went through and taking that closely.

For most window light shots, I "cheat light" my subject on the side of their face that's closest to the window by the foot with the most shadows, and the side furthest away from the main light. You do this by having them turn their heads towards the side away from the window, so their back feels a little pinkey without knowing their angle. This helps to make your subjects feel less nervous and to guarantee that a flattery, or more flattery, is needed here.

Also: Your subject might should be a little higher than your subject's head, so you're looking down. When you return your shooting, a little down on them, again for a more flattery look. Photographers, for a more flattery look, take that subject your subject look less well, don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have their face in the shot a bit like you're shooting at their back, take up the corner in the shot.
