Window Light Portraits

Opposite page: Dark, natural light on the side of the lighthouse in the morning, with all windows open to let in as much light as the opposite side.

At right: By not having your subject face the window directly, you can then position the subject diagonally. This creates a soft, diffused light that appears to come from the side, rather than from the opposite window. In effect, it's a soft window light, though not directly from the window.

At the bottom: Window light photo. "Window light" was taken at the side of their house with a camera that has a lens to fit in with the iPhone camera. It's the one feature every iPhone user needs. You can see the lighting from the window on the left and the window on the right and the person's window lighting that's used to light to make one a smooth face that's better and a square face that's more like the face in the window light.
