Window Light Portraits

Opposite page: Dark, natural light on the side of the lighthouse in the morning, with all windows open to let in as much light as the opposite side.

10. Light is not always your enemy when the window blinds are open. When you're in the process of taking a portrait, the window is on the right, you can open your shades to reveal bright light from the opposite window on the left, creating a much more even lighting and better skin clarity.

11. For most window-light photos, "natural light" was taken at the side of your face with a camera that's oriented to the sun with the blinds drawn, so the sun follows you as you move. But for me, by taking the opposite side, the sun follows me as I move, and I can take a photo with the sun behind me, creating a much better shadow. Position your hands and the person you're taking the photo of to allow for a nice, smooth face that features a dramatic, warm lighting that highlights the skin in a wonderful way.

12. This scene might sound like a new chapter from your childhood book, or even a nursery rhyme. After all, when people shooting a photo of their aging parents, it's natural to want to photograph the person looking out over the ocean that's been their life. But we might also have been surprised that the person they wanted to look out over the ocean of their life was actually in the back side of the photo, or the dock.
