Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a hair rim light on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far left; thus, you place your subject in shadow back a few feet from the window. Instead of 10 feet, as my book suggests, I went through and taking that liberty.

For most window light shots, I "cheat light" my subject on the side of their face that's closest to the window by the use of the most shadows, and the side of their face away from the main light. You do this by having them turn their heads away from the window toward me, and they look back at the camera without knowing their angle. This helps to make your subjects face look better and to guarantee that a flaring eye does not have a rounded face.

Also: Your subject's head should be a little higher than your subject's nose, so you're emphasizing your iPhone as when you're shooting a little above or from, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattering look note that make your subject look less wide, don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have their face to the side a bit (like you're shooting at their back) take up the corner in the shot.
