Markets, Distribution, and Exchange After Societal Cataclysm Robin Cantor, Stuart Henry, Steve Rayner, 2000-12
This report identifies constraints and opportunities for the restoration of economic exchange after nuclear war. Four survival scenarios are postulated based on high or low levels of damage to 1 institutions that signal trading opportunities reduce transaction costs and regulate and enforce contracts and 2 resources that are used to create and define wealth. The four scenarios are Best case, Worst Case, Resource Abundance and an Institution Intensive case. Discussed in depth are such items as property rights, barter, currency, trust, credit, supply and demand and trust as related to authority.

Nevertheless it may be a necessary precursor to the establishment of trust between traders as well as the restoration of currency and credit. Fourth, planning for the recovery of markets for particular goods should recognize that there will be major shifts in supply and demand. The value of goods and services may undergo tremendous changes that are difficult to detect from price information even where it is available. Also, the uses to which goods and services are put systematically lose their attractiveness because of socially generated changes in demand. Fifth, a critical problem will be the maintenance of trust and authority. The more drastic the change from pre-attack society, the more difficulty people have in deciding whom to trust, who has the skills that they advertise, and who will behave with fiduciary responsibility.
