In the span of a short yet exceptionally prolific career, Luxembourgish artist Michel Majerus (1967-2002) transgressed the well-worn rules of painting to capture the influence of digital media and pop culture during the 1990s and early 2000s. Majerus's large-scale paintings and installations, characterized by the artist's sampling and collaging of an eclectic repertoire of imagery and text borrowed from art history, video games, commercials, and electronic music, resonate with the rapid expansion of globalized consumer culture and digital technology. This book collects and preserves the talks and lecture performances held during a symposium on Majerus at Mudam, the contemporary art museum in Luxembourg. The convening considered the relevance of Majerus's reflections today and discussed the dimensions of his legacy, investigating
