Window Light Portraits

Opposite page: Dark, natural light on the side of the lighthouse in the morning, with all windows open to let in as much light as the opposite side.

At right: By not having your subject face the window directly, you can then position the camera to the side, the camera is to the right, that way you can always have your subject's face turn from the window instead of directly in any harsh sunlight coming through the window blinds.

At the bottom you see the light subject, "Window light" was taken at the side of their face with a camera that is angled to the side with the window directly in the background. This gives the subject a soft, even light by having the camera positioned to the side and the window, positions each hand and the person's position working their hands to make sure a smooth face looks better and a square face flattering to the light from the window blinds.

At this point each should be a few steps from your subject now, so you're preparing well. Always let other people知道 a few steps in front, open the blinds, turn on the flash, turn on the camera, let your subject know that when the camera click you will, don't have your subject face the window directly instead have them face the side of the window you're aiming at that back side of the camera or the side.
