Abstract. In temperate climates, agricultural ditches are generally bounded by seasonal vegetation, which affects the hydrodynamics and mixing processes within the channel and acts as a buffer strip to reduce a load of pollutants coming from the surrounding cultivated fields. However, even if the control of such vegetation represents a key strategy to support sediment and nutrient management, the studies that investigated the effect of different vegetation maintenance scenarios or vegetation coverage on the flow and mixing dynamics at the reach scale are very limited. To overcome these limitations and provide additional insights into the involved processes, tracer tests were conducted in an agricultural ditch roughly 500 m long close to Warsaw in Poland, focusing on two different vegetation scenarios: highly vegetated and fully cut. Under the highly vegetated scenario, sub-reaches differing in surficial vegetation coverage are analysed separately to better understand the influence of the vegetation conditions on the flow and mixing parameters. Special attention has been paid to the longitudinal dispersion coefficient in complex natural conditions and its dependency on vegetation coverage ( $V$ ). The vegetation maintenance decreased the travel and residence times of the solute by 3–5 times, moderately increasing the peak concentrations. We found that the dispersion coefficient decreased approximately linearly with the increase of vegetation coverage at  $V > 68\%$ . Further research is needed at lower vegetation coverage values and different spatial plant distributions. The obtained longitudinal dispersion coefficient values complement dispersion value datasets previously published in the literature, which are barely available for small natural streams. The new process understanding supports the design of future investigations with more environmentally sound vegetation maintenance scenarios.

1 Introduction

Despite the crucial role of aquatic and riparian vegetation in keeping riverine ecosystems healthy (Rowinski et al., 2018; Soana et al., 2019), extensive vegetation cutting is widely practised to enhance the flow conveyance, e.g. for flood and agricultural water management. While environmentally friendlier vegetation maintenance practices and channel designs have been proposed in the past (Buisson, 2008; SEPA, 2009), traditional ecologically harmful cutting and dredging practices continue to be applied, despite their large-scale negative influences on agricultural streams and rivers (Old et al., 2014; Bajczyk et al., 2018). In two-stage channels and other nature-based designs, clever, environmentally friendlier vegetation maintenance may provide possibilities for enhancing the retention of suspended sediment and nutrients while maintaining flow conveyance (e.g. Kindervater and Steinman, 2019; Väistölä et al., 2021). However, optimising the performance of such vegetated channel designs requires an improved understanding of the influence of spatially variable vegetation distributions on transport and mixing processes (Rowinski et al., 2022).
