

Ecological adaptations of Parasites

The plants that grow and obtain their organic food from other living organisms are called parasitic plants. The living organisms from which the parasites obtain their food is called host. In order to obtain their food they produce parasitic roots or haustoria which penetrate into the host tissues.

Parasites may group into two categories, as follows;

- Obligate parasites- which can live only on the living host.
- Facultative parasites- which are saprophytes but can also grow as parasites.

Parasites may be, Endo-parasite- those growing inside the host and ecto-parasite, those growing outside the host.

Most common examples of parasites are fungi and bacteria. The parasitic fungi are rusts (Puccinia), smuts (Ustilago) and many others and parasitic bacteria includes Xanthomonas citri, Bacillus species etc.

Parasitic angiosperms;

Parasitic angiosperms can be classified into broad types, namely stem parasites and root parasites.

Stem parasites: These are again can be classified as two types as follows,

- Holoparasites: These are the parasites which entirely depend on host for their food, water and minerals. They are usually non-chlorophyllous. Ex: Cuscuta

Cuscuta is the most common example of total stem parasite, commonly called as dodder. Seeds of Cuscuta germinate in soil. Seedlings are long, filamentous and without cotyledons. The young plant grows and performs rotary movement and twin around the host plant. On establishing contact with host the young seedling develop absorbing organs called haustoria, which are small modified adventitious roots which penetrate deeply into the host tissues. The haustoria are metabolically active and help in absorption and provide channel for the transportation of organic food, water and minerals. The mature plant loses connection with soil and becomes completely dependent on host. The mature plant is very long, filamentous, branched, non-chlorophyllous, pale yellow with small scaly leaves. It produces bunches of whitish or yellowish bell shaped flowers.
