What are the Effects of Disability on Children?

A serious disability affects a child's ability to participate in common daily activities and might make it difficult to go to school, make friends, and generally have a normal life. It can be physically painful, frightening and might make the child angry or withdrawn. It can make the child feel different and isolated. The situation is compounded when other children talk about a child looking different or being afraid of "catching" the disability. Some children cope well with the pressures of a chronic illness while others need special support.

How Do Children Cope with a Disability?

How a child copes with a disability is dependent on a number of things:

- The severity of the disability
- The child's age when diagnosed
- The outward appearance of the child including facial or body deformity and/or dependence on a medical device
- The child's personality and upbringing and ability to handle stress
- The family dynamics

Over time, the child's reactions might change and the child often feels loss anew when their peers are attaining new abilities or developmental milestones that they do not.

How Do Parents of a Disabled Child React?

Part of the psychological preparation during pregnancy involves the dreaming and visualization of a perfect, beautiful baby. Parents often have many expectations for the "idealized" child. The birth of a child with a chronic illness or the discovery that a child has a disability has profound effects on a family.

When parents learn that their child has a disability or special health care need, they begin a process of continuous, lifelong adjustment. Adjustment is characterized by periods of stress. During this time, family members' individual feelings of loss can be overwhelming, shutting out almost all other feelings. Coping with uncertainty about the child's development may interfere with the parents' ability to provide support to each other and to other family members. Even when the diagnosis is clear, there are still many uncertainties – health, programmatic, and financial.
