Dual-earning Parents' Work-family Balance and Time with Children Shuting Xie, 2016 Achieving work family balance is a challenge for many families in Canada especially for dual earner families with children in the household Prior research regarding the predictors of work family balance has mainly focused on work characteristics therefore the current study aimed to assess the predictive effect of a key family characteristic quality time with children on work family balance The two objectives of this study were a to describe the association between time with children and parents work family balance among Canadian dual earner parents and b to understand the effects of age of the youngest child parent's gender and parent's age on the association between work family balance and quality time with children This study used cross sectional national time use data from the General Social Survey GSS 2010 Cycle 24 T test and logistic regression analyses were used to address the two research objectives and all analyses were weighted Findings indicated that work family balance was negatively associated with quality time with children Age of the youngest child parent's gender and parent's age were found to moderate the effect of quality time with children on work family balance The negative effect of quality time with children on work family balance was stronger for parents who had a youngest child of an older age than for those who had a youngest child of a younger age for parents who were older than for those who were younger and for mothers more than for fathers Findings of this study can add strength to the understanding of work family balance of Canadian parents and have implications for helping Canadians balance their paid work and family life demands As well the findings indicate a more nuanced exploration of how parents relationships with their children affect their experience of work family balance is needed in future research Dual-Earner Families Suzan Lewis,Dafna Israeli,Helen M
