Xhomara,2021 School leadership has been identified as a key function in assuring quality in education The instructional leadership model refers to the role and the functions of school leadership to employ different management tasks with regards to teaching and learning Instructional leadership role includes a developing mission and goals b managing the educational production function c promoting an academic learning climate and d developing a supportive work environment Instructional leaders were described as leading from a combination of both expertise and charisma focused primarily on the improvement of student learning outcomes The monograph entitled Instructional Leadership and Effective Teaching and Learning and written by Nazmi Xhomara is dedicated to school instructional leadership as an important factor that influences teaching and learning at school. In the first chapter the author presents and analyzes educational leadership vs educational management as well as models of educational leadership and management. The author argues on the importance of different leadership models such as managerial leadership, transformational leadership, participative leadership, interpersonal leadership, transactional leadership, postmodern leadership, moral leadership, and contingent leadership. Chapters Two, Three, and Four shed light on instructional leadership and teaching and learning, understanding of instructional leadership, the concept and practice of instructional leadership, instructional school leadership, and learning environment attributes of instructional leaders, instructional excellence, instructional leadership time management, effective teaching and teachers as well as teaching challenges and learning environment. Meanwhile the author has analyzed constructivism, student intelligence, understanding of supervision, instructional collegial supervision, supervision approaches, understanding of evaluation of teaching and learning, teacher evaluation, and instructional observing instruments in chapters Five, Six, and Seven. Chapters Eight and Nine are focused especially on the research work of the relationships between instructional leadership and teaching, learning, and students' achievements as well as on an empirical study designed and conducted in Albania as a case. Chapters Ten and Eleven are dedicated to instructional leadership preparation and the future of instructional leadership. As a conclusion, Xhomara indicates that principals are responsible for developing school climates and cultures that support the very best instructional practices. The new era of instructional leadership has predictably placed significant demands for accountability for student success and equity on the principal as well as for the university programs that prepare them. Working in twenty-first century schools, the instructional leader is held more accountable than ever for student success.
